Grangegorman and the treatment of soldiers' trauma

10 November 2022

Author Eamon Delaney leads the 'The Lion and the Shamrock' project which shares some of the legacy of military history of the north Dublin area, including Grangegorman. Here Eamon explores the treatment of soldiers with psychological trauma resulting from their experiences of the First World War at the Richmond War Hospital, a facility on the grounds of the then Richmond District Asylum located at Grangegorman.

The revitalised Grangegorman campus, with its many young and eager students, is an uplifting and poignant sight, given its historical role in the treatment of those mentally and physically challenged. Part of the Grangegorman legacy is often unheralded—its role in the treatment of soldiers suffering from trauma as a result of World War One. Just as wider mental challenges were often unexplored at the time, the soldiers' trauma was then also relatively unacknowledged.

At the time, the trauma was known as 'shell shock'; now it is more collectively referred to as PTSD—Post-traumatic Stress Disorder. Symptoms included disturbing flashbacks, nightmares, acute nervousness and exceptional and intense deliriums. Treatment focused on the effect of trench warfare and exposure to constant, high-explosive shelling. World War One was, after all, an intense, close-quarters conflict, involving a level of mechanised combat never before seen.

'Instituting Grangegorman' podcast launches for Dublin Festival of History 2022

10 October 2022

'Instituting Grangegorman' is the second in the Grangegorman Histories podcast series exploring the histories of the Grangegorman area of north, inner-city Dublin.

About the podcast

For Dublin Festival of History 2022 and to mark World Mental Health Day, 10 October, Grangegorman Histories has launched 'Instituting Grangegorman' the second in the Grangegorman Histories podcast series exploring the histories of the Grangegorman area of north, inner-city Dublin. This podcast explores the history of the Richmond Lunatic Asylum, now the recently restored TU Dublin Lower House.

Join architectural historian, Patrick Quinlan, as he explores the chequered career of this landmark building: a story of optimistic conception and utilitarian service, of neglect, decline and demise, culminating in the latest chapter of rebirth as a valued architectural and historical landmark.
